At that moment, the bride finds out that she is pregnant. The groom returns to his wife, and she is shocked to see the ring that he is wearing, and she demands to know what happened. The groom informs her that he proposed to her that night, but she refused. He asked why she turned him down, but she refused to answer. As they leave the wedding, the groom tries to ask his wife again, but she won't talk about it. She leaves without looking back at him. Analysis As a narrative, the short film plays like a vignette. However, the film's technique of minimalism belies the genuine emotion behind the story. According to Nathalie Léger, the story is an "observation of a reflection" (2002, p. 1). Thus, the short film is an example of the field of view. In this instance, the film provides only one eye view, but it is seen through the eyes of a wife. Although the wife knows that her husband did not propose to her, she is also so shocked that she does not know what to do, and she keeps silent. Fittingly, the sound design in the film provides background noise for the short film, as if the events were taking place in real life. In this case, the sound design is minimal, as the sound does not serve as commentary. The film's sound design, which is both fast and calm, appears to be a reflection of what the film is like. As reflected by Dyer, the sound design takes a "nascent form" and at the same time "emerges fully formed" (1997, p. 42). The video recording is relatively still, and the image appears to be tense and awkward. The audio is calm and quiet, but it is very clear and concise. The short film has a similar sequence to vignettes found in fiction. The first shot of the film shows an outside shot of a street. This approach is more artistic and stylized than the one used in vignettes, which are often more naturalistic.
